Making art accessible

Updated: May 14, 2019, 07:15 IST | Dalreen Ramos

A mentorship and networking session by an interdisciplinary arts organisation promises to help creative professionals navigate the art industry

The session will take place for the first time, followed by an open networking event

Perhaps the biggest tragedy about the Indian education system is this — it doesn't equip you for the "industry". And then there are additional roadblocks one has to face if they aren't a science or commerce graduate. Rashmi Dhanwani, founder of the Art X Company, an interdisciplinary arts organisation, echoes this sentiment. "There is no formal training in the arts and culture space. If you're enrolled in an engineering or medical course, you have a set career path — for instance, an engineer will know when he will need to do an MBA. But what about the others?" It is this question that her organisation aims to tackle this Wednesday.

that even though discussions are being organised in the city, they continue to be sector-specific and not cross-sectional — like a forum theatre artistes participated in last month to discuss copyright issues.

The ACRI culture meet will give mentees a platform to not just discover more about their field of interest, but also make meaningful connections. "With the arts, you get to know more about how the industry functions only when you start working. But you can't just ride on good luck," she cautions, adding that physical access is also a challenge, given that most arts institutions are located in South Mumbai. "That's the reason we're going to have this one in Kalina. People shouldn't have to keep travelling to town every day. And we hope to organise more in the future after we get feedback from this one."

On May 15, 5 pm onwards

At The Art X Company, Kagalwala House, Kalina, Santacruz East.
